well-directed effort on the part of the British officers of coasting vessels to improve their position is worthy of encouragement. Nothing is now to be obtained without combination and without unity of action. The improved position of the trading classes in England is in a large measure due to the Trades Unions, which in spite of many blunders and regrettable weaknesses have done much good. Great Britain owes its immunity from revolutionary movements mainly to the strength and cohesion of these Unions. But for an association or union to work successfully must have a definite object in view. If the British Mercantile Marine Officers' Association do any good, it must throw aside clap-and its energies within practical limits. Captain Ashton, who addressed the Association on the other evening, made on the whole a practical and sensible speech, counselling moderation and sweet reasonableness. The nomination of an officer on board a ship is a very responsible one, and it is one which, properly filled, requires long training, a good education and considerable intellectual ability. It is pretty generally recognised that the pay of the officers on the coast is not quite proportionate to the responsibility thrown upon them and the services they are called upon to perform. The substitution of steamers to sailing vessels has diminished the demand, and course of time no doubt a readjustcontinue the officers of the present day, and they are justified in trying to push forward this readjustment. One of the methods of securing their ends, recommended by Captain Ashton, is however, in my very serious objection. The British officer is excluded from the ships of almost every foreign nation, and he very naturally considers it an injustice that foreigners should be allowed to serve on our British ships by obtaining British certificates. He accordingly seeks with me to show of reason that Great Britain should treat foreigners, as foreign nations do to Britishers—that in fact British officers ought to be 'protected.' But Great Britain will never do anything of the sort, and the British Mercantile Officers' Association need not waste its energy agitating for a change. The English have been contented by the experience of the last forty years, that the British officer is not

A SUMMER GARDEN IDYL.

Long they lingered by the gateway
In the garden—he and she;
He was tall and straight and stately,
She was lovely as could be.

Pale his face almost to wanness,
As he kissed, and kissed her still,
And the earnestness of her gaze
Was a sight to make men ill.

ed marches had been allowed for the annual race-meeting. Our Subaltern had a pony, a pony that he had bought for a mere song, that he had trained himself for gymnastics, and with which he had picked up a number of the little prizes of the turf; and finding him so good, he had put him into expert hands; he had been tried satisfactorily, against the very best trying tackle that the stable had, and our Subaltern stood to win or lose all he possessed over him in the big race on the next day. And now that he had risked every rupee that he was worth, he had suddenly to find by next day nine hundred rupees in ready money.

"I'm very sorry, sir," the Colour Sergeant said; "I was a bit careless, and if I'm given time, I'll make it all up out of my pay."

"No, no, Sergeant," it was not your fault; I should have put it in the guard-room. I'll have the money by to-morrow, though how I'm to get it I don't know."

The Colour-Sergeant averted his face, and his sub. could not help him; for they too had plunged on the little chestnut Arab's chance. The two married Captains he could hardly ask, and the Major had taken a week's leave. The banks could scarcely be expected to think that his belief in his pony's paces was good enough security to lend money on; and to make matters worse, the pony, which he backed at five, had receded in betting to twelve; an excellent opportunity to pile on some more money if he had it; a fatal time to try and get out. With the officer and his bet he stood to win Rs. 5,000, and not one pic of this could he touch without running the risk of being posted. It was desperately annoying, to say the least of it.

While he sat and thought, matters seemed no brighter for the thinking, he heard a discreet cough and a "Beg pardon, sir," Private Wilson whistles to speak to you, and going outside he found Private Wilson, an old three-banded soldier, the smartest man in the Company, standing at attention, and Sergeant Smith, the senior Sergeant, with him. "Beg pardon, sir," said Wilson, "we know, sir, as the Company money has been stole."

"We was all anxious to get our pay to-morrow, and a bit of an advance too, if we could; for we wanted to back your pony, sir, just for the honour of the Company and the Regiment. What I'd make so bold as ask you, sir, is this. We hear you've got a lot of heavy bets, sir; if it would be a convenience to you, sir, might we stand in our pay? There's seven married men who can't, and Private Smithkins, what says that betting is immoral; but all the rest of us want to go our dubs on the pony, sir."

"And the Sergeant and Corporals would wish to do the same," put in Sergeant Smith. "But I backed the pony at five to one, and I'd gone back to twelve to one."

objected the sub. "Five to one's better odds by a lot than we'd get outside," said Private Wilson, and in half a dozen words more the matter was settled. Next morning the men came up in turn, had their names read out and the amount of pay due to them put down in this pay sheet, saluted, grinned, and went off. The married men and Smithkins got their pay.

It was five in the afternoon and the second bell had rung for the big race. The Subaltern up in the Stand feels sick and drops his glasses, and a hush falls on the crowd as they watch the number board. The judge's penance seems to be as sternly; but at last up goes the board and some ninety odd respectable soldiers of H. Company are dancing like escaped lunatics on the glare; for the little Arab's number is on top. And the story of that race and of the real payday on the following Monday, is it not one of the most cherished legends of H. Company, and a story much admired as told in the content?—FELICIAN in Hayes' Sporting News.

The police are out, and as the chestnut canter puts, carrying the officer and black, a voice from the scarlet-clad crowd says, "Give 'em a cheer, lads, and a shout goes up that startles the nonchalant Stand."

Twice the dots of colour come up to the starter, twice they go back, but the third time a great hoarse sound tells that they are off. A galloping mass thundering round the curve, here and there a remark from a man who is watching with glasses, heard amidst the dead stillness of the Stand; then, as they come to the quarter mile, a brown and a black are seen to be leading, the chestnut lying third and the rest close up.

No more silence now, every man has the fever of the race on him, and is shouting for his pony. Out from the rack comes with a rush a grey, collars the leaders, holds them for a hundred yards, and then drops back, for the pace has been too hot. The black has shot his bolt too and as he falls back, the rider of the chestnut makes his effort, and while H. Company are saluted, grined, and went off. The married men and Smithkins got their pay.

shoulder to shoulder, the chestnut flashes past the post locked with the brown. The Subaltern up in the Stand feels sick and drops his glasses, and a hush falls on the crowd as they watch the number board. The judge's penance seems to be as sternly; but at last up goes the board and some ninety odd respectable soldiers of H. Company are dancing like escaped lunatics on the glare; for the little Arab's number is on top. And the story of that race and of the real payday on the following Monday, is it not one of the most cherished legends of H. Company, and a story much admired as told in the content?—FELICIAN in Hayes' Sporting News.

THE SIGNALMAN ON THE MIDLAND.

There are probably about a million men employed in various capacities on the Midways of Great Britain—a number large enough, if they were soldiers, to conquer Europe. Upon the intelligence, fidelity, and physical condition of this vast army depend the lives of the multitudes who are constantly travelling by rail. Any sudden and serious disability happening to one of them may result in a disaster which would put hundreds of families in mourning. Accustomed as it is to safe and swift conveyance from point to point, the public scarcely realises this fact. The following brief narrative, which is strictly true, will therefore be read with interest:

On the Midland Railway, twenty-three miles south of Oxford, there is a little station called Culgaith. Here there is a signal-box in which Signalman Andrew Agge is to be found on duty daily. As is the case with all other signal boxes, this one contains the levers, the usual complicated electric and mechanical contrivances for making and receiving signals. Mr Agge is on duty nearly every day, and takes his luncheon without leaving his post. He is a sturdy man of thirty-five, in good health, and no complaint has ever been made against him by the public; but an incident occurred a few years ago that came near depriving him of his position and his life. For some time he had not felt well, the worst and most dangerous phase of his indisposition being a kind of giddiness that would seize upon him unexpectedly, and as he described it, "as everything to moving and twisting round and round." The doctor told him frankly that it was a symptom of a still more radical complaint brought on by too much confinement, and by his irregular habits of eating and sleeping, and that he had better abandon his work for a while, and try a change of scene and life.

But this was easier said than done. He had a family to support, and could not afford the luxury of a vacation. He knew no other business, and could not risk the loss of his place. His work was always done, however, no matter how he felt. But it is only fair to say he had many anxious hours over it. His situation, which he had covered up by indignation and despair, now set up more alarming symptoms. A physician at Appleby assured Agge that there was serious trouble with his kidneys and bladder. "It is," said the doctor to the Signalman, "the result of the condition of your circulation. Your blood is poisoned by your stomach, and every organ of the body is crippled by it."

This was a miserable outlook for Agge, who went back to Culgaith with small courage for his work. He took hold, though, as well as he could, and kept it up until one morning when a disaster which would put hundreds of families in mourning. Accustomed as it is to safe and swift conveyance from point to point, the public scarcely realises this fact. The following brief narrative, which is strictly true, will therefore be read with interest:
